(54) Title: A DIGITAL COMMUNICATION DEVICE AND A MIXER

(57) Abstract

Known is a digital communication device having a dual conversion architecture. A first RF-mixing stage is provided followed by a second, quadrature, mixing stage of which output signals are sampled by means of an analog-to-digital converter and supplied to a DSP for further baseband processing. Proposed is a modified sigma delta analog-to-digital converter. A mixing function is added to the A/D-conversion function by modifying the input stage of a conventional sigma delta bitstream A/D converter. Herewith, a reduced number of IC-external components and a reduced power consumption are achieved.
